Geography, being essentially an empirical science, uses varied information much of which is collected through careful and systematic field surveys which constitute, therefore, an integral part of geographical studies. Even the fleeting glimpses of geographical features have profound significance as they, besides arousing a keen interest in the minds of budding geographers, give them the first hand information about geographical facts, thus augmenting the information they are already provided in the class room. The students, during the geographical field trip, observe, analyse and evaluate various geographical phenomena. All along the way the students were shown a large number of varied geographical features both geomorphic as well as socio – cultural.
